ABSTRACT

In an era where social and economic progress is closely tied to sustainability, innovative solutions that promote mindful consumerism are essential. This article presents a smartphone app designed to assist those in need by enabling the resale of used items at fair prices, rather than functioning as a profit-oriented marketplace. In addition to selling used clothes, electronics, and other essentials either for free or at a minimal cost, the app also enables the distribution of surplus food to nearby orphanages and shelters. This initiative supports the principles of a circular economy, reduces waste, and encourages the reuse of pre-owned goods.

The app includes verification features to prevent misuse and ensure that recipients genuinely require assistance. Additional security and transparency are enhanced through community reviews, eligibility checks, and user authentication. This app connects those in need with individuals who have surplus resources, promoting personal growth and transformation.

Beyond encouraging environmental sustainability, this approach provides essential items to disadvantaged individuals and nurtures a sense of social responsibility and generosity. This initiative exemplifies how innovation, growth, and ethical responsibility can come together in today's world by leveraging technology for sustainable and compassionate purposes.
